Black Folk Art In America: 1930-1980

A Disconcerting Delight

Hunter Drohojowska

I have a friend, a video artist, who regards art criticism with ill-concealed skepticism. He consistently reminds me that for thousands of years, art was not created for the reasons that dominate the art world today. In fact, he usually adds, even today, art in many parts of the world, such as Asia, India, and Africa, fulfills a deep spiritual as well as cultural need within the society. Elsewhere, art doesn't long to be so avant-garde, so outside the societal mainstream. In America, however, one finds that only folk art functions in this fashion; that is, art made by plain folks, not trained in the labyrinthine theories of art schools. This genre of artwork may be seen in the exhibition "Black Folk Art in America: 1930-1980" at the Craft and Folk Art

New Jerusalem by Sister Gertrude Morgan

Museum through February 6. As Herald-Examiner art critic Christopher Knight will tell you at the slightest nudge, the realm of visual aesthetics may be divided into high art, popular art and folk art. These categories are not hierarchical but rather separate and equal. When popular or folk art
